Recently, one of his closest friends asked him to make a speech at his wedding reception. This is the sort of thing that Paul really loves. He prepared his speech carefully and went to the wedding with Julie. He had included a large number of funny stories in the speech and, of course, it was a great success. As soon as he had finished, Julie told him that she wanted them to go home. Paul was a little shocked by this, but he loved his daughter very much and did what she asked. On the way home he asked Julie whether she had enjoyed his speech. To his surprise, she said she hadn't. When he asked her why this was so, she replied that she did not like to see so many people laugh at him.

The next morning the ship was still in the same place so I went on board again.

I did so every day, and by the time I had been thirteen days on the island, I had made eleven trips to the wreck and taken away everything that my one pair of hands could carry.

As I was preparing to go to the wreck for the twelfth time, a strong wind started blowing. But the tide was still low, so I took my clothes off, swam to the ship and got on board without difficulty. Again I found a number of useful things to take and among them a pipe and some tobacco, two or three razors, a pair of large scissors and about a dozen of good knives and forks.

Then, in one of the drawers which I thought I had completely emptied before, I found some gold and silver coins worth all together about £36. At their sight I smiled and cried, "What are you good for?! One of those knives is worth more than all of you! I'll just leave you here!" However, upon thinking about it again, I took all the coins and started making another raft for the new things I had collected.

In a quarter of an hour the sky got dark, the wind was blowing stronger and stronger, and I had to get back to the shore before the tide started flowing in. It was very hard to swim to the shore, partly because of the weight of the things I had with me and partly because of the strong wind and the rough water. But, this time, I was lucky. I had got to my tent with all the things I had recovered just before a storm broke out.

The wind blew very hard all night and in the morning, when I looked out, the ship was gone. I was sorry, but at the same time I was glad to think I had lost no time in getting out of the wreck all the things that could be useful to me.

I should also say that we had taken on board the ship two cats and a dog. Fortunately, these animals were saved from the wreck, too. When I first came on board, they heard me moving about and ran up to me showing signs of their joy at seeing me again. I was glad to see them too and to have them as my companions. I took the cats on my first raft. I was going to take the dog later, but he jumped out of the ship and swam after me, getting to the shore with the raft. He was a faithful servant to me for a number of years. At times I was only so very sorry that he could not talk.

21. As the story opens the narrator

It's part of the New Year ritual – an annual attempt to start afresh and turn over a new leaf. But making resolutions is almost a pointless exercise, psychologists say. We break them, become discouraged in the process and finally more depressed and pessimistic than we were before.

Less than a quarter of those surveyed for a university study had managed to stick to their resolutions. Of those who failed, many had followed the false advice of self-help gurus.

Richard Wiseman, a psychologist at the University of Hertfordshire, who conducted the survey, said he and his team had asked 700 people about their strategies for achieving New Year resolutions. Their goals ranged from losing weight or giving up smoking to gaining a qualification or starting a better relationship.

Of the seventy-eight percent who failed, many had focused on the downside of not achieving the goals; they had suppressed their desires, fantasized about being very successful, and adopted an impossible role model or relied on willpower alone.

"Many of these ideas are frequently recommended by self-help experts but our results suggest that they simply don't work," Wiseman said. "If you are trying to lose weight, it's not enough to stick a picture of a model on your fridge or fantasize about being slimmer."

On the other hand, people who kept their resolutions reported to have broken their goal into smaller steps and rewarded themselves when they achieved one of these. They also told their friends about their goals, focused on the benefits of success and kept a diary of their progress.

People who planned a series of smaller steps as stepping stones to their large goals had an average success rate of thirty-five percent, while those who followed all five of the above strategies had a fifty percent chance of success, the study found.

"Many of the most successful techniques involve making a plan and helping yourself stick to it," Wiseman said.

Making New Year resolutions at the last minute can backfire and not produce the desired effect, he warned, because such decisions tend to be less genuinely motivated. "If you do it on the spur of the moment, it probably doesn't mean that much to you and you won't do your best to succeed."

Other strategies that helped people to achieve their goals included making only one resolution at a time and treating occasional failure as just temporary.

26. New Year's resolutions are

- A) easy to stick to.
- B) recommended by psychologists.
- C) inspired by self-help guides.
- D) None of the above.

27. Which is NOT among the resolutions mentioned by the subjects in Richard Wiseman's study?

- A) Becoming slimmer.
- B) Quitting smoking.
- C) Acquiring a new skill or knowledge.
- D) Getting a new cell phone.

28. The best way to achieve your goal is to

- A) keep picturing your success.
- B) stick a photo of a famous person on your fridge.
- C) make a plan and keep track of your progress.
- D) count on your willpower alone.

29. What does NOT contribute to success in keeping your resolutions?

- A) Making a quick decision about the choice of goal.
- B) Discussing your resolution with your friends.
- C) Achieving your goal gradually, step by step.
- D) Rewarding yourself on the achieved success.

30. Overall, how many of the people in Richard Wiseman’s study successfully stuck to their New Year’s resolutions?

- A) Less than 25 %.
- B) 35 %.
- C) 50 %
- D) 78 %.

It could be a long time before Ben Jackson goes to college. He was arrested and charged with breaking into his prestigious high school and hacking into computers to change his test grades from Fs to As. If convicted on all 68 counts, Mr. Jackson could spend almost four decades in prison.

Prosecutors claim that the teenager also changed the grades of 12 other students and that he installed spyware on school hard drives that allowed him to access the computers from remote locations.

Mr. Jackson's plan was to get a place at one of the best universities in the country. After his application was rejected, he requested copies of his student records, known as "transcripts", so he could appeal. But when the teachers looked at his files and noticed all the A-grades that had miraculously appeared, they realized something was wrong.

School administration alerted law enforcement after noticing discrepancies in Mr. Jackson's grades. Subsequent investigation revealed that Mr. Jackson was in possession of original tests, test questions and answers and copies of his altered grades. Mr. Jackson is accused of stealing master copies of tests, some of which were e-mailed to dozens of students.

The case has once again raised the question of whether technology, in particular mobile phones that can access the internet, has resulted in an epidemic of cheating in the high-school system.

THE PRICE OF LIFE AND DEATH

I think it happened in 1896, when we were living in London. A report was sent to the American journals that I was dying, but I was not the person who was supposed to be dying. It was another Clemens, a cousin of mine, who was due to die but presently escaped death by chance and by obstinacy typical of the whole Clemens family.

The London representatives of the American newspapers began to flock at my place with American telegrams in their hands, and to ask about my condition. There was nothing the matter with me and each in his turn was astonished, and not pleased, to find me reading and smoking in my study.

One of these men was a gentle and kindly and grave and sympathetic Irishman, who hid his disappointment the best he could and tried to look glad. He told me that his paper "The Evening Sun", had cabled him that it was reported in New York that I was dead.

What should he send in reply?

I said, "Say the report is exaggerated."

He never smiled but went solemnly away and sent the telegram in those exact words. The remark hit the world pleasantly and to this day it keeps turning up, now and then, in the newspapers when people have occasions to condemn exaggeration of any kind.

The next man was also an Irishman. He had his New York telegram in his hand – and was evidently trying to hide it from me to the extent that my curiosity was aroused and I wanted to see what the telegram did really say. So when occasion offered, I slipped it out of his hand and read it before giving it back to him.

It said, "If Mark Twain's dying, send five hundred words. If dead, send a thousand."

Then you will hear the text again and will have 1 minute to check your answers.*

Halloween is the last night of October, also known as All Saints' Day. It used to be considered the most magical night of the year, when witches and evil spirits came back on earth to do their magic spells, so people kept many strange old customs in an effort to keep these evil influences away. Farmers used to light big fires in their fields, and the farm workers and their families would walk around the fields singing old songs and hymns. At intervals, the strange procession would stop to hear the local priest offer prayers to the good spirits, and ask them to help keep the evil ones away. Great care was taken that none of the farm animals were left in the fields. They would all be locked up safely in their stables and sheds, and over each of the doors a few tree leaves would be hung.

In more recent times, Halloween has become a time for parties, when children dress up as witches or ghosts and play all sorts of special games such as "Ducking for the apple". During that game a bucket is filled with water and a few apples are thrown in; the children then try to catch one of the floating apples with their teeth without using their hands. To prevent cheating, the children are often made to hold their hands behind their backs. After the games there is often a big supper for the whole family with plenty of pumpkin pie, cakes and a lot of other delicious things to eat.

However, what children seem to enjoy best at Halloween is the fun of dressing up and playing their favourite "Trick or Treat" game. They run down each street, knocking on the doors and crying loudly 'Trick or Treat', and most people have some sweets ready to give them. Those that do not can expect the children to do some kind of nasty 'trick' on them, like flatten one of their car tyres, or cover their windows in soup or paint. Alternatively, the children may simply knock on the door and run away.

Nowadays, many of the houses have a jack-o'-lantern in their windows, which is a hollowed out pumpkin in the shape of a monstrous face with candles burning inside. But in this modern age many of the pumpkins are being replaced with plastic electric ones that can be brought out each year.
